

The imperfect begetting of the sofa sleeper

In the beginning God was at rest and God was rest. God dreamt that he was an infinite sleeper sofa.

This dream bore fruit and a mattress unfurled from inside of the sofa of God and left his cushiony fullness for the outer darkness of the living room. It was of his nature but it was distinct from Him. It represented the Father's rest fullness, but the rest that it offered would never compare to the Father's. One who rests upon this mattress is but a visitor in another man's house.

This mattress was the first born of God. Then God made the sleeper second born. It is incorrect to think of the two as separate however. As the Father is rest and is at rest, so the bed is both sofa and sleeper.

The bar that gouged the sleeper's back was the limit between the rest of the sofa and the mere impression of rest that was produced by the mattress. The bed was never level and it was impossible for the sleeper to cease from tossing and turning.

The bed was made thusly: the frame extended to the cold floor known as iiiioaaooiiiiiooooo and raised it up [ ] bones, the mattress was the carnal lump of inert flesh, the sleeper was the remembrance of the dream of the father, and the sheet that lay upon him and conformed to his shape was the selfsame word of the Nag Hammadi, the Gita, the Upanishads, and a million other books.

Outside of the living room there were dogs sniffing one another's asses in the night. They churned and milled around, yelping and howling, desperate animals with desperate appetites that could not be satisfied. Their muffled commotion kept breaking in upon the sleeper's dreams. They reminded him of his separation, his alienation, and the bar gouged into his back. The world sucked, the bed was in it, and he couldn't get back to sleep.
